In my director’s update last year I noted that our best political leaders serve us well not only while in office but by leaving behind institutions that continue to advance the values and goals for which they fought. My comment was made in connection with the passing of Speaker Foley last year, and in light of the fact that the institute bearing his name will soon celebrate its 20th anniversary.

This year’s cover story features another long-time Washington political leader, Sam Reed. Sam’s legacy will also continue to live on at the Foley Institute with the establishment of the Sam Reed Distinguished Professorship in Civic Education and Public Civility.

Sam Reed served the citizens in the state of Washington with great distinction for more than three decades, including 12 years as Washington’s fourteenth Secretary of State. Sam’s passion for civic education was well known. He gave tirelessly of his time to educate the public, especially students and young people, about the virtues of democratic self-government and about various public policy issues of the day. As Secretary of State, he presided over Washington’s closest and most bitterly contested election, during which he earned respect across the political aisle and an unparalleled reputation for his even-handedness, fairness and civility.

Although Thomas Foley and Sam Reed belonged to different political parties, they were both respected and well-liked by those on the other side of the aisle, something rare in today’s politics. I am convinced that people often misunderstand what makes such political leaders so effective and beloved. It is not that they eschew partisanship – Foley loved the Democratic Party, just as Reed was a loyal Republican – but they understand that democracy requires a refined approach toward those with whom we disagree. It requires us to treat their views and opinions respectfully, and to honor their common citizenship even when we disagree deeply about policy.

Sam Reed understood and embodied this commitment to the democratic ideal throughout his long career in public service. So it is an honor that the Foley Institute will be establishing the Reed Distinguished Professorship. In the future, holders of the professorship will teach and engage in research that advances the values that Sam Reed stood for – creating an informed citizenry and a more considerate and civil political discourse. If you can, I hope you will accept my invitation to pay tribute to Sam Reed’s service by contributing to the establishment of the professorship that will bear his name and help us continue his legacy of civic, and civil, engagement here at the Foley Institute.

Remodel update

Last year, the Foley Institute completed its move from a cramped home in Johnson Tower, where we had been located since 1995, into our new home in Bryan Hall, with its iconic clock tower at the center of WSU’s Pullman campus.

The institute’s new space in Bryan Hall includes a Speaker’s Room in which we hold many of our events. Most of these events are streamed and are also available for watching again, either from our web page at foley.wsu.edu or at our Facebook page. A YouTube channel will go live during this forthcoming academic year.

Our new offices include a conference room and foyer, both of which contain furniture on long-term loan from the U.S. Congress, as well as numerous other awards and interesting objects collected by Speaker Foley during his long and distinguished political career.

The Speaker’s Room also showcases part of the Frank & Marty Mullen Political Memorabilia Collection. It consists of political campaign buttons and pins dating back to 1824. The collection was started by Frank Mullen, former professor of political science at WSU, and was donated to the institute by his wife, Marty Mullen. Part of the collection is pictured below.

Please stop by and visit us at our new location next time you are in Pullman.

Structural Human Ecology

This year, the WSU Press and the Foley Institute published Structural Human Ecology. The book is a collection of essays delivered at an institute-sponsored symposium held in September 2011, honoring the work of Eugene ‘Gene’ Rosas, WSU Boeing Distinguished Professor of Environmental Sociology, and previously a distinguished professor affiliated to the Foley Institute.
The Foley Institute is honored to announce the creation of the Sam Reed Distinguished Professorship in Civil Education and Public Civility. Sam Reed, a WSU alum, served the citizens of Washington for over 34 years in public office, first as county auditor for Thurston County, and for the last 12 years as Washington’s Secretary of State. The Professorship, the fourth to be housed in the institute and the first created since the institute was initially established, recognizes Secretary Reed’s years of dedicated public service and his extraordinary commitment to civility and civic education.

Sam Reed received his bachelor’s and master’s degrees in political science at Washington State University. After graduation, he relocated to Olympia to intern in the office of Secretary of State Lud Kramer. By the age of 28, Sam was appointed Assistant Secretary of State, and was chosen by Governor Dan Evans to head the Governor’s Advisory Council on Urban Affairs.

In 1978, Reed won his first elected position of Thurston County Auditor, a post he held for 23 years. During this time, his dedication to innovation, student engagement, and voter turnout led his office to be nationally-recognized with nine awards.

Reed became Washington’s fourteenth Secretary of State in 2000—a title which he held until deciding not to run for a fourth term in 2012. His many accomplishments included major election reform, including a new statewide voter registration system that prevents opportunity for fraud. He also championed the “Top 2 Primary,” which allows voters to choose any candidate on the primary ballot, regardless of political party.

However, he is perhaps best known for his handling of the 2004 Washington gubernatorial race, the closest in U.S. history. In that election, it took two recounts to name eventual winner Christine Gregoire by a margin of 129 votes. Reed was widely honored for his fair handling of the extremely close election and resulting court cases, and wrote the foreword to a book on the events around that election: An Election for the Ages: Rossi vs Gregoire 2004 published by WSU Press.

Throughout his career, Reed was a tireless advocate for civic education, often finding time in his busy schedule to speak at public gatherings throughout the state and to return to his alma mater to speak to students and faculty at WSU. During numerous visits to the Foley Institute, Reed cherished the time he had with students, encouraging them to pursue careers in public service and giving them an inside understanding of the political challenges and controversies the state confronted. His office also hosted a number of WSU undergraduate interns. As Secretary of State he also took the initiative to invite the Foley Institute to partner with his office to host annual symposia on major public policy issues each year in Olympia, attended by members of the legislature, their staff, and the public.

Reed was an outspoken advocate for a return to civility in public discourse and electoral politics. Widely respected on both sides of the aisle, he was known for the great civility with which he treated everyone, even political opponents, and for his even-handed style in conducting the often volatile work of running elections in the state of Washington. On account of his reputation for civility, Reed was invited to be a keynote speaker at the Foley Institute’s 2011 Conference, Civility and American Democracy, held in Spokane and supported by a large grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

“Sam Reed’s reputation for bipartisanship and for believing that people of different political beliefs can work together to find common solutions to problems is unusual in today’s political climate,” said institute director, Cornell Clayton, “Sam’s long career is an exemplar of honor in public service and a commitment to civil discourse.”

Given Sam Reed’s long-time commitment to civility and civic education, along with his relationship to the Foley Institute over the years, the institute was the natural place to house the new Reed professorship. As Daryll DeWald, Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences noted, “these distinguished professorships have benefitted most of the students at WSU by recruiting or retaining some of our very best professors. From my perspective, the Reed Professorship at the Foley Institute will helped us keep our best scholars and educators working in the area that Sam Reed cared so much about – civic education and civility. WSU students have an enhanced educational experience which is our investment in the future of this state and nation.”

The professorship will assure that Reed’s legacy of educating the public about civic affairs and encouraging honor and civility in public service will continue. “After enjoying working with the Foley Institute extensively during my twelve years as Secretary of State, it is an honor and privilege to have this professorship,” he said. “It strikes me as appropriate and critically important to have this professor work with the institute to promote political civility and the teaching of civics throughout the state. I am excited about the opportunities that will be presented to candidates, elected officials, teachers and students.”

The Media & Political Transformation in the Arab World

The fifth annual Media and Politics Symposium on April 23, 2014 explored how social media and blogger activists impacted recent events in the Middle East. Co-sponsored with the Edward R. Murrow College of Communication at WSU, the panel discussion was moderated by Lawrence Pintak (dean of the Murrow College).

Deen Freelon, assistant professor of communications at American University, discussed how social media influenced the events in Syria, and how Twitter feeds reflected the way foreign and domestic audiences responded to events as the crisis developed. David Faris, professor of political science at Roosevelt University, explained how the internet has long served as an outlet for political grievances in the Middle East, even before Facebook and Twitter were available. He explained how social media significantly influenced the Egyptian uprising in 2011 and how bloggers and political groups formed on social networking sites to plan protests against government forces.

Is Financial Reform Working and Should More Be Done?

Jerry Kallberg, the Alvin J. Wolff Distinguished Professor of Real Estate at WSU, provided an overview of the 2008 crisis. He was followed by Richard Riccobono, Director of Banks at the Washington State Department of Financial Institutions, who discussed the provisions of the Dodd-Frank Act and assessed where it had met, or failed to meet, expectations. James Barth, the Lowder Eminent Scholar in Finance at Auburn University, placed the current reform efforts into a broader historical context and suggested several lessons that could be gleaned from past experience.
The Science, Ethics, and Politics of GMOs and Your Food

The fall SEPP Symposium, held on October 28, 2013, was designed to educate Washington voters about Initiative 522, which required foods containing genetically modified organisms be labeled as such. The panel discussed the empirical research about, and ethical dimensions of, genetically modified organisms in food.

Paul Thompson, Kellogg Chair in Agricultural Food and Ethics at Michigan State University, explained the history of food labeling, arguing from an ethical perspective that it was hard to oppose providing consumers more information about what they eat. Michael Neff, the director of the Molecular Plant Sciences Graduate Program at WSU, explained that extensive studies on GMOs provide a high level of confidence in their safety. Heather Hansen, the executive director of Washington Friends of Farms and Forests, expressed concern that the proposed initiative might confuse consumers due to the contents of many everyday foodstuffs that would fall under the proposed regulations. Chuck Benbrook, program leader at the Center for Sustaining Agriculture and Natural Resources at WSU, suggested that, since many people are concerned about the possibility of side-effects of long-term GMO use, they should nevertheless have the benefit of GMO labels on their food.

Initiative 522 was rejected by voters in November 2013, following the most expensive initiative campaign in Washington’s history (see related article on page 8).

The Ethics of Animal Experimentation

The spring SEPP Symposium, held on March 13, 2014, focused on the ethics of experimenting on animals. Sylvie Cloutier, a research professor in the Department of Integrated Physiology and Neuroscience at WSU, who opened the event with a brief overview of animal cognition. Comparing this with human cognition and emotion, she shared studies that show animals have deep emotions. Gary Varner provided a philosophical perspective on the moral status of animals. As a professor and head of the Department of Philosophy at Texas A&M, Dr. Varner offered an overview of different philosophical perspectives regarding animal cognition. Also participating was WSU’s Campus Veterinarian, Steven Russell, who explained his role overseeing experiments performed on animals, and the policies WSU researchers must follow when using animals for experiments.
Annual Olympia Symposium
Disengaged Youth and Encouraging Millennials to Vote

The Foley Institute was pleased to continue its collaboration with the Washington Secretary of State’s Office to host the fifth annual public policy symposium in the state capital at Olympia on February 21, 2014.

This year’s symposium was introduced by Secretary of State Kim Wyman, and the panel of experts considered why younger citizens tend not to vote despite their interest and participation in other social issues and causes.

Panelists included Kei Kawashima-Ginsberg, Deputy Director, Center for Information & Research on Civic Learning & Engagement at Tufts University; Emile ‘Mel’ Netzhammer, Chancellor, Washington State University – Vancouver; Lindsay Pryor, Voter Education & Outreach Coordinator, WA Secretary of State’s Office; and Toby Crittenden, Executive Director, The Washington Bus, a non-profit, non-partisan organization that seeks to engage youth in the political process.

You can listen to Kei Kawashima-Ginsberg being interviewed by Austin Jenkins for NPR on this subject, by going to: nwnewsnetwork.org/post/despite-party-differences-millennial-state-lawmakers-find-common-ground

Washington Attorney General Bob Ferguson
Following the Money: Accountability in Campaign Finance

On April 3, 2014, Washington State Attorney General Bob Ferguson returned to the Foley Institute to discuss transparency in campaign finance and spending by outside groups on I-522 (requiring the labeling of genetically-engineered food), which appeared on Washington’s 2013 ballot.

The Attorney General filed a lawsuit against the Grocery Manufacturer’s Association (GMA) for illegally donating $11 million to the “No on I-522” campaign and improperly concealing large corporate donors. The case, still pending in the courts, is the largest case of campaign finance concealment in state history (see related article on page 7).
Washington Supreme Court Chief Justice Barbara Madsen
The Role of an Independent Judiciary in Washington

The Chief Justice of the Washington Supreme Court made a return visit to the institute on March 28, 2014. Chief Justice Barbara Madsen discussed the important role of state courts in the political system and the challenge that state judges have to remain politically independent. Madsen’s talk highlighted the state Supreme Courts’ role in shaping national political change, given that the U.S. Supreme Court often defers to state courts or looks to them for guidance when deciding cases involving controversial policy questions.

“Coffee with Your Legislators”

For the fourth consecutive year, Washington’s District 9 legislators made their annual trip to the institute on December 4, 2013, to discuss the upcoming legislative session. Senator Mark Schoesler, along with Representatives Susan Fagan and Joe Schmick, covered a number of topics related to the 2014 session, including the state budget, university tuition levels, transportation needs, and mental health care in the state. WSU and Pullman community members alike had the chance to have their questions answered and thoughts heard.

A Long, Strange Trip: Legalizing Recreational Marijuana in Washington

On February 27, 2014, Chris Marr of the Washington State Liquor Control Board visited the institute to discuss implementation of Initiative 502, which legalized the production, retail sale, and possession of recreational marijuana. Marr provided an overview of the initiative and its stipulations, including tax structure and regulations. He described the challenges of creating a policy framework for regulating recreational marijuana in Washington when the drug remains prohibited under federal law.

Should Washington Adopt a Carbon Tax?

Visiting the Foley Institute on November 12, 2013, Yoram Bauman holds the distinction of being the first comedian to speak to a Coffee & Politics session at WSU. An environmental economist based in Seattle, Bauman is a fellow at the Sightline Institute, a non-profit research center focused on Northwest sustainability. The “stand-up economist” co-authored the book Tax Shift which inspired the revenue-neutral carbon tax adopted by British Columbia in 2008.

Bauman explained the logic behind adopting a carbon tax by suggesting the tax would encourage a lifestyle change for Washingtonians while taxes in other areas could be reduced. This tax-swap would allow revenue from the carbon tax to go toward funding low-income programs such as the Working Families Sales Tax Rebate.
Political Polarization

On October 3, 2013, the Foley Institute welcomed Matthew Levendusky, associate professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

Author of The Partisan Sort and How Partisan Media Polarize America, Levendusky’s research examines mass-level political behavior and the effects that media have on political polarization. His talk coincided with the government shutdown that began just two days earlier on October 1.

Levendusky explained that empirical studies show that elected elites have become increasingly polarized along partisan lines while average Americans remain relatively moderate in their views. They do, however, increasingly align themselves with media sources that they know will support their ideological beliefs, and this is leading to increased polarization among the public as well.

Is Transparency Good for Democracy?

Mark Stephan, associate professor in the School of Politics, Philosophy and Public Affairs at WSU-Vancouver, spoke at the institute on March 25, 2014, discussing the role of transparency in governmental decision-making.

Stephan argued that while citizens’ access to information is critical in a democracy, the emphasis on “transparency” may be a problem. Full transparency can limit policy-makers’ ability to take risks and work effectively. Rather than transparency, Stephan argued in favor a regime based around “disclosure” as a more useful way to disperse information about government activity.

Money in Elections

David Parker, professor of political science at Montana State University, visited the institute on April 16, 2014, to discuss his work on campaign spending following the Supreme Court’s decision in Citizen’s United, relaxing campaign spending limits on corporations.

His research showed that almost all political advertisements aired on television in Montana were paid for by outside sources, rather than the candidates. He suggested that virtually unlimited outside funding will lead to lengthier campaign seasons and will force local companies to increasingly compete with political groups for commercial air-time. This cyclic campaign spending, he said, is impossible to control, and may keep the most qualified candidates from winning office.
Remaking Urban Nature

On March 24, 2014, James Elliott, professor of sociology at the University of Oregon, discussed the impact of industrial waste on urban communities.

Comparing four river port cities—Portland, New Orleans, Minneapolis, and Philadelphia—his research found that residual industrial waste has impacted large areas of these cities and had ill effects on citizens regardless of their age, race or socioeconomic status. The problems are caused by factories that close, leaving behind waste residing in the soil. As urban renewal projects convert these previously industrial areas into housing developments, parks or shopping districts, they often simply pave over the residual industrial waste.

Culture and Sustainable Development Policy

On September 27, 2013, the institute co-hosted (with the WSU Department of Anthropology and the College of Arts and Sciences) E. Christian Wells, associate professor of anthropology at the University of South Florida. An environmental archaeologist, Dr. Wells stressed the role that the behavioral sciences should play in policy-making. Touching on his field-work in Belize, Mexico, and Tampa Bay, Wells explained how anthropological research methods have been used to unearth physical evidence upon which a more sustainable environmental policy can be based.

Wells is currently co-principal investigator of a National Science Foundation-funded research project studying the relationship between tourism and coastal health in Caribbean communities.

Do we have Moral Autonomy?

On January 24, 2014, the institute hosted Alfred Mele, the William H. and Lucyle T. Werkmeister Professor of Philosophy at Florida State University.

Mele’s talk focused on the nature of moral choice in public policy, explaining how powerful situational influences shape an individual’s decision-making process. Nevertheless, Mele argued, that evidence from experimental psychology indicates that we are not “zombies” but possess the power to control many of our thought processes and moral decisions, and public policy should reflect this.

Confessions of a Young Rebel

Mary Beth Tinker came to the Foley Institute on April 28, 2014, to speak about her experience as a young political activist protesting the Vietnam War. Tinker described her experience as a 13-year-old girl suspended from Des Moines Public Schools because she chose to wear an armband banned by school administrators.

Her challenge to the school went all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. The case (Tinker v. Des Moines) was decided in her favor, and remains a landmark decision defining the free speech rights of students.
China and Cybersecurity

Nelson Dong, a prominent Seattle attorney with experience in cases involving cyber-espionage, came to the institute October 28, 2013, to discuss China and cybersecurity.

Dong noted that as more companies and government agencies go online, cybersecurity is a growing problem. Cyber-attacks coming from China in particular have been rising, with most cases targeting U.S. intellectual property and state secrets. The government, he said, needs to do much more to protect its own security information as well as the intellectual property of American corporations from such attacks.

The U.S.—Iran Relationship

Abbas Milani, the Hamid & Christina Moghadam Director of Iranian Studies at Stanford University, visited the Foley Institute on October 10, 2013, to address the Iran-U.S. relationship. Describing the history of the relationship, Milani expressed hope that relations might improve in the wake of President Obama’s contact with Iranian president Hassan Rouhani, breaking a long-term silence between the two countries.

During a question and answer session Milani also discussed the Iranian diaspora, with the loss of highly-educated Iranians to other countries, and explained the historical inaccuracies found in the award-winning film Argo, among other issues.

The New “Great Game” in Central Asia

In partnership with the WSU Asia Program, the Foley Institute hosted Anara Tabyshalieva, professor at Marshall University and consultant for the World Bank and the United Nations Development Fund for Women on February 21, 2014.

Dr. Tabyshalieva discussed the “Great Game,” or the ongoing competition between Russia, China, the U.S., Japan, India, Iran, the EU, and others for control of Central Asia. She suggested that the two groups that hold the most power over the region are the Russia-centered Collective Security Treaty Organization (CSTO) and the China-centered Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO). These two groups are seeking control over the area for cultural, monetary, and military reasons, and the region’s growing desirability connected to the renaissance of the Silk Road.
Revolt in the Desert

Lawrence Pintak, dean of the Edward R. Murrow College of Communication at WSU, visited the institute on September 10, 2013, to discuss recent events in Egypt.

Drawing upon his experience in the Arab World and as a director of the Kamal Adham Center for Journalism Training and Research at the American University in Cairo, Pintak discussed the fallout between the Muslim Brotherhood and the secular Arab nationalist groups in the wake of the ousting of former Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Political unrest following Mubarak’s imprisonment led to the removal of the Muslim Brotherhood-backed Morsi by the Egyptian military. Much of the instability in Egypt, Pintak said, is caused by the weakness of civil society and strong non-governmental institutions.

He concluded his speech by predicting that there would be more unrest before a peaceful resolution was found. While there were no “good options” in the short term for U.S. policy toward Egypt, in the long term he argued that Western countries needed to help Egypt build a more robust civil society.

American Democracy Through British Eyes

The institute was visited by Gillian Peele, Fellow and Tutor of Politics at Oxford University, on September 3, 2013.

Peele assessed the quality of American democracy and the dysfunctions possibly caused by an outmoded American constitutional system. Peele commented that few other democracies around the world actually experience a shutdown of governmental functions, which, she noted, is symptomatic of deeper structural problems in the political system.

Despite inherent problems with the system, Peele was optimistic that American democracy would continue to endure, and noted that the inability to decisively confront tough policy choices was not unique to the U.S.

How Foreign Voices Shape U.S. Support for Military Action

On November 4, 2013, the institute welcomed Danny Hayes, professor of political science at George Washington University.

Hayes shared his research on how partisanship influences American perceptions and support for foreign military interventions. Hayes’ research suggests that voters’ views about military action are strongly shaped by the position taken by partisan elites, and he compared this with findings on how foreign governments and international bodies, such as the United Nations, influence domestic views about U.S. foreign policy.

The Foley Institute’s Coffee & Politics series provides an informal venue to connect WSU students and faculty with local and national members of government, political scholars, and experts in public policy. If you would like to be added to our email distribution list, please email Richard Elgar: relgar@wsu.edu.
This past year was another successful one for the institute’s internship program. The institute’s internships are career-enhancing experiences, allowing students to integrate their academic studies with work in a practical arena. In addition to bridging the gap between formal schooling and work, internships often function as a launching pad for careers in public service.

Four Foley interns spent spring semester in Olympia as part of the Washington State Legislative Internship program for the 2014 session. Evangelina Alvarez and Trevor Brown interned in the House of Representatives, while Stephanie DeHart and Arthur Whitten completed internships within the Senate.

Additionally, Jansen VanderMeulen, interned as WSU’s Director of Legislative Affairs spring semester in Olympia, and students of the Cougar Lobby Team collaborated in preparation for lobbying in Olympia at “Coug Day at the Capitol.” Students Hayley Hohman, Leoma James, Annie Pocklington, Alex Shipman, Timothy Chatburn, Dakota Renz, and McKenzie Wright completed internships with the Cougar Lobby Team this year.

Conor Devitt completed a journalism internship with The Oregonian, where he spent his time reporting on political stories from Olympia.

Interns were also involved in ASWSU’s Student Legal Services, an office that provides legal service for WSU students. They included Director Chris Morgan and Associate Director Katherine Naulty as well as William Jensen, Jillian Berg, Francisco Carriedo, and Jeffrey McCrea.

Other students were involved in a variety of internship opportunities. Derek Lambert interned as a Reserve Police Officer at the Pullman Police Department. Jordan Isom interned with WSU PhD candidate Lucas McMillan to assist with research. on judicial philosophies. At WSU Spokane, Maria Delane was a research assistant to Professor Kawkab Shishani’s study of waterpipe smoking cessation.

Alex Clark and Alex Stevens interned as Reserve Deputy Sheriffs with the Whitman County Sheriff’s Office. Alejandra Mendoza interned with the WSU Alumni Association.

We would also like to thank our Foley Institute interns: Joel Freeborn, Jillian Archer, and Stephanie Logan, who assisted in the Institute’s daily operations this academic year.

We are very pleased to announce that Daniel Purkeypyle is this year’s Lance LeLoup Congressional Scholar. Dan is spending the summer in Washington, D.C., in the office of Congresswoman Cathy McMorris Rodgers. He is pictured here meeting former Speaker of the House, Newt Gingrich.

Thanks to the generous support of donors, the Foley Institute is able to offer a number of scholarships to interns each year, including the Lance LeLoup Congressional Scholarship for internships in the U.S. Congress. Please contact us if you would like to know more, or if you are interested in contributing to our scholarship fund!
The institute is very pleased to announce the recipients of six graduate student fellowships this coming year. The fellowships were awarded to students who conduct research into just and sustainable societies and policies, seek to enhance their public policy research skills and pursue a research agenda focusing on major policy issues, or conduct research in the area of political institutions and democracy.

As always, there were many excellent nominees this year, so congratulations to all of the students below.

Scott & Betty Lukins Graduate Fellowships were awarded to Lucas McMillan (Political Science), and Melanie Thornton (School of the Environment).

Alice O. Rice Graduate Fellowships were awarded to Greg Atkins (History), and Michael Lengefeld (Sociology).

Burlington Northern Fellowships were awarded to Christopher Gambino (Animal Sciences) and Hong Zhang (Sociology).
I hope that my work will help Americans to approach the current war on terrorism in a more aware and critical manner.

“This past April I completed work on my dissertation, Outlaw States: The United States, Nicaragua, and the Cold War Roots of the War on Terrorism. My work demonstrates how terrorism crises in the 1980s transformed U.S. foreign policy. In response to events like the hijacking of TWA-847 and the murder of four U.S. Marines in El Salvador in June of 1985, the Reagan administration altered the old model of Cold War containment and constructed a new offensive policy to combat state-sponsored terrorism. Thus, long before September 11, 2001, the United States established key principles for the war on terrorism.

The Reagan administration’s move toward a global response to terrorism involved the adoption of aggressive unilateral measures against states that were suspected sponsors of terrorism. The administration argued that terrorism was a new tactic in an expanded Cold War, involving an alliance of radical Middle Eastern powers, communist nations, and Marxist revolutionaries. In order to respond effectively to this threat, it adopted a new framework of intervention that challenged the norms of international behavior and marginalized the sovereignty of nations suspected of involvement in terrorism.

Research on this project involved important trips to the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library, the George Bush Presidential Library, and the National Security Archive at George Washington University. The research was intensive and not without unexpected challenges, such as the government shut down, in October 2013, just as I was beginning my research at the Bush Library in College Station, Texas.

Over the course of sifting through thousands of documents, I was overjoyed to discover several significant and recently declassified documents. These new documents, released between 2006 and 2012, provided new insight into how the U.S. conflict with Nicaragua became not only a war on communism but also a war on terrorism. Perhaps most exciting were memorandums from Robert Oakley and Parker Borg, top officials in the Office of Counterterrorism, that strongly opposed the administration’s counterterrorism approach. In the dissertation, I use the opinions of Borg and Oakley to show how there was an alternative to the course of action taken by the administration. In this respect I hope that my work will help Americans to approach the current war on terrorism in a more aware and critical manner.

I want to thank the Foley Institute as well as Scott and Betty Lukins for providing support. Important research trips to presidential libraries and other archives were made possible by the Foley Institute’s generosity, and I am very grateful.
