1. In your opinion, what is a ‘global citizen?’ What is the global citizen’s significance, purpose, and responsibility?

2. Why are you interested in joining this cohort program?

3. What strengths, skills, passions, or abilities do you bring to this cohort program?

4. What do you hope to learn and/or what skill do you hope to develop in this program?

5. How do you see your major playing a role in the global arena?

6. Where do you see your level of involvement with other university opportunities (academic programs, curricular activities, clubs/organizations, etc.) over the next four years? How do you plan to balance your academic and curricular responsibilities with this program?

The Center for Transformational Learning and Leadership (CTLL) Global Citizenship Program (GCP) is an interdisciplinary, transformative student cohort program that develops leaders and empowers global citizens in agricultural, human, and natural resource sciences who will successfully address the interconnected, global issues that currently face our world.

Graduates of the CTLL GCP will graduate from Washington State University with the ability to solve complex problems, lead with global responsibility and cultural empathy, and effectively communicate in intercultural exchanges, as they continue to develop their global professional network.
