Research Interests

My research examines interrelated work, family, and education experiences across the life course, with particular focus on well-being and achievement in adolescence and the transition to adulthood. I am currently involved in research tackling families' and young people's adaptations to the changing nature of the transition to adulthood, including familial financial support in young adulthood and its implications for attainment and well-being; change in educational and work ambitions tied to changing personal and historical circumstances; and the interplay of inequality and the development of social psychological resources in promoting well-being and attainment.
