Tricia Glazebrook

Professor

Politics, Philosophy, & Public Affairs

Tricia Glazebrook is making profound contributions in teaching, research, and service around the world through her cross-cultural, interdisciplinary research and leadership.

Her scholarship aims to identify, assess, and offer solutions to problems faced by people in areas affected by climate change. A champion for vulnerable and underserved communities—particularly women and youth in the Global South—she partners with experts across the social and environmental sciences, as well as policy makers, human rights advocates, and marginalized communities, in seeking answers to climate and equity challenges.

Tricia also applies her international experience and knowledge to teaching and mentoring students. A philosopher by training, she developed a course examining philosophical, scientific, epidemiological, and other aspects of global disease outbreaks well before the recent pandemic.

Holding leadership positions in various international policy research and academic/professional organizations, Tricia played a critical role in developing the WSU-Africa Resilient Communities Project, a scholarly exchange program with educational institutions in Africa. She now leads the program's food security thread.

While continuing to publish and lecture widely from her research, Tricia is truly helping to make the world a better place.
